

Here's the sixth of the 21 hats that the corporate secretary wears (here's the blog about the fifth hat): "Related to being persuasive is knowing the varying traits—the distinct hot buttons—for each of the directors that you work with. Each will be different in their own way, and winning over each one of them might require a different approach.

This is much more than 'hand-holding.' This is knowing how to read a room. Knowing which director admires other directors—and which ones don't.

I guess you could say this is playing politics. But it's not that really. It's just using common sense and leveraging what you've learned about the true nature of each person. Following your instincts so that you can obtain the optimal end result.

You're using this skill set to try to keep the board collegial. This enables the board to run smoothly. This is not about creating an atmosphere so that everyone agrees with the CEO. In fact, it's really the opposite. You want each director to be comfortable—to feel safe enough—to be able to play the role they were hired to play. To ask probing questions, consider alternatives thoughtfully, bring fresh ideas to the table. Draw all of these good things out of each director."

Explore more in

Corporate Law

Blog series

Public Chatter

Public Chatter provides practical guidance—and the latest developments—to those grappling with public company securities law and corporate governance issues, through content developed from an in-house perspective.

View the blog